CHF: Forecast Revisions

Key takeaways

- We lower our CHF profile this year and next: EUR/CHF profile largely unchanged but bring forward parity call to Q2 2025
- Lower CHF remains our key high conviction short as softer inflation reduces the need for the SNB to keep CHF strong
- Profiles look for steady CHF depreciation for a traditionally low vol currency. Risks are for a fast pace of depreciation

High conviction in weaker CHF

A structurally weaker CHF has been a high conviction call for BofA since the start of the year, and while we had already factored this into our profile, we make further tweaks and expect a slightly faster pace of depreciation. Exhibit 1 provides a summary of these changes. We bring forward our parity call to Q2 2025 from Q4 whilst USD/CHF is expected to hit 0.85 by Q2 (Exhibit 2 & Exhibit 3). These tweaks are in recognition of the sharp move following weak January CPI and the rising risks that the SNB may go sooner rather than later in cutting rates. While minor, we would describe the risks to our CHF profile to the downside.

Structural CHF weakness is consensus

Exhibit 4 & Exhibit 5 compare and contrast CHF forecasts versus the consensus and forwards. The immediate dynamic that sticks out is that while we and market are looking for a similar trajectory in EUR/CHF, forward rates are moving in the opposite direction reflecting a more aggressive ECB easing cycle than that of the ECB. Volatility in EUR/CHF is amongst the lowest in G10, but we think the forward curve offers opportunities if we see a renewed spike in FX volatility.

Finally, Exhibit 6 looks at CHF forecasts versus G10. Expected CHF returns from spot to Y/E '24 and Y/E '25. Our forecasts suggest that short CHF/Scandinavia would offer the next returns from current spot levels with the added advantage of positive carry, particularly for NOK.
