

Euro Area Watch

ECB review: June it is Key takeaways

- No big surprises in the press conference, but a clear message: absent big surprises, cuts can start in June.
- Our call remains: quarterly 2024 cuts starting June, faster ones to 2% by mid-25 as core disinflates further than they think.
- Rates: little impact on net. We focus on cuts coming. FX: little news for the EUR.

Guiding to June

The message from this week's ECB meeting was loud and clear. The ECB was certainly not ready to cut now but it is getting ready to cut soon if the data is in line with expectations. To us, that clearly points to a June rate cut, when they will have a lot more data (as emphasized several times by ECB's President Lagarde during the press conference). The bar is very high for a move before that, i.e., April.

Their base case is probably a very slow cutting cycle

We did not get much guidance on the potential pace of the cutting cycle. Data dependence will continue to dictate the speed. But we would argue that the ECB implicitly had in mind a slow pace given that Lagarde flagged that: i) the restrictive season will take a while; and ii) market expectations make more sense now.

What does it mean for data to be in line? It's all about wages from here, and domestic inflation. They don't see a lot of progress, both series need to moderate from here in line with expectations for the cutting cycle to start, even if slowly.

We still see more disinflation in 2H24

But we do see a lot more progress on disinflation, as we have continuously flagged (Europe Economic Weekly: Not fashionably late 23 February 2024). Our conviction on the first cut in June remains strong. And our conviction that data will end up pushing them to accelerate the cutting cycle is strong too (see Exhibit 2 for our vs the ECB's quarterly core inflation forecasts).

We stick to our call: depo at 2% by mid-2025

As a reminder, we still expect the first (25bp) cut from the ECB in June. We have 75bp of cuts in 2024E and 125bp in 2025E (one per quarter in 2024, accelerating to one per meeting in December). Data (a persistent inflation undershoot to target) will eventually push the ECB to speed up the cutting cycle by more than they currently expect. Hence, our call for the ECB depo to be at 2% by mid-2025.

ECB review

Forecasts: still hawkish, just a little less so than before

Revisions to ECB forecasts were largely as we expected. GDP growth was revised lower in the short term, slightly higher in 2025/26. Headline inflation was revised lower this year (on the back of energy) but core inflation moved only at the margin. Crucially, end-2026 core inflation was revised to 2%, but crucially not falling below that.

To us, these forecasts match the rest of the message: progress on the path to target is being made, but confidence in it is missing. Data over the next few months is crucial, downward surprises probably won't bring forward the cutting cycle, significant upward surprises can delay it.

We wouldn't label these new forecasts as dovish, however. The underlying inflation view is still on the hawkish side from 2H24 onwards: GDP levels by the end of the forecast horizon are lower, but core inflation changes are only minor. The ECB still view inflation dynamics as much stickier than we do (Exhibit 2). That brings us back to our base case after the summer, or at the latest in 2025, the central bank is likely to have to accelerate rate cuts as data challenges their expected inflation persistence.

New forecasts, old (and rather hawkish) narrative: fast disinflation at first, a lot of stickiness thereafter.

The ECB and our core inflation forecasts are similar in 1H24. We assume that continued disinflation in 2H24 will ultimately lead to faster cuts.

Rates: Roundtrip, as ECB pushes back against April. We focus on cuts coming.

The initial market reaction to the ECB's monetary policy statement was decidedly bullish. The downward revisions to the ECB's staff forecasts of inflation in 2024-26 and growth in 2024 can explain the price action. Markets added 7bp of cuts to 2024, with the total thereby reaching 100bp for the year. 10y Bund yields rallied also by 7bp at peak, also supported by slightly weaker than expected US data.

Most of the rally reversed by the end of the ECB's press conference. While President Lagarde noted the ECB's increased confidence in the disinflationary process and appeared to signal that a cut would be coming in June, the market may have been taken aback by the continued reference to elevated domestic inflation and risks around wages, alongside the pushback against an earlier April move.

Taking on board our economists view that domestic inflation will moderate more rapidly from mid-Q2 onwards, we continue to believe that Bund yields will be lower in 2H and that, as the ECB starts cutting in June, the market will slowly reprice the terminal rate lower. We also look for a structurally wider UST-Bund spread. However, the path towards this is complicated in the near term by data uncertainty, stemming from the US but also from Easter seasonality in Europe. If the ECB maintains its message of increased confidence in the disinflation process, we could see additional duration buying in the Euro Area, which would then exacerbate the bullish effect of reduced EUR-denominated bond supply pressures.

EUR: little news

There was little news for the EUR at today's ECB meeting, in line with our expectations. The EUR slightly fell initially amid the downward forecast revisions. This reversed amid Lagarde's cautious comments in the press conference. While we learnt nothing new today, we grew more confident that the ECB (1) remains data-dependent; (2) is very unlikely to cut before June; (3) can act independently of the Fed.

We remain of the view that US data, the Fed, and overall risk sentiment matter more for EURUSD than the ECB: we still forecast EURUSD at 1.15 by end-24, driven by a narrower US-Euro area sequential growth spread and supportive risk sentiment, assuming the Fed starts cutting rates in June. Of course, the more hawkish ECB stance vs. that of the Fed increases our conviction around our year-end forecast.

In line with what we have seen this year, we would expect the ECB impact to be seen more clearly in the crosses: we expect the relative ECB stance to modestly support the EUR vs. CHF, NZD, and CAD this year, but weigh on it vs. GBP. We also expect EUR to weaken vs. AUD and the Scandies, as we likely gradually move past peak China and Euro area bearishness.
