Jakarta trip notes: Meeting with destiny – 14 days and counting

14 days and counting

Indonesia is 14 days away from its 1st round Presidential election on February 14. An estimated 204.8 million registered voters are set to go to the polls at 823k polling stations, to vote for their President and legislative representatives, making this one of the most complicated elections in the world.

The winning candidate needs to win 50% plus one extra vote to win the first round. Additionally, the Presidential candidate needs to win 20% or more of the votes in over half of Indonesia's 38 provinces. Voting will close at 1pm and the first quick vote counts will provide a sense of the winner by 3-4pm. An official result will be given around 10pm local time. One potential issue is that there can be a margin of error of +/-1%, meaning that if the vote is very close, we may need to wait until late March for a final verified count. Even this could be contested, resulting in a final determination being made as late as May. Failure to win the 1st round would mean the two leading Presidential candidates having a second run-off on June 26.

Too close to call, but macro is in a good place.

During our trip to Jakarta this week, we spoke with numerous political and polling experts. The consensus is that Prabowo is the front runner given his polling lead. However, there was a divergence of views over whether he could win on the first round. If Indonesia goes to a second-round Presidential vote, the confidence over a Prabowo election is less certain. There are three Presidential candidates currently in the race: Prabowo Subianto (Gerindra Party), Anies Baswedan (independent) and Ganjar Pranowo (PDI-P). The general view is that a second-round race between Prabowo and Anies could be very close run, if Anies is able to garner support from Ganjar supporters.

Policy makers – seeing is believing.

The overall frame of mind of policy makers is to stay cautious and focus on delivering low inflation and macro stability. This is motivated by two issues: Firstly, the much-anticipated US recession of 2023 never transpired to deliver Fed easing and easier monetary policy in EM. As such, policy makers are skeptical of a March easing, and see June as a more realistic baseline. Secondly, with Indonesian Presidential elections underway, it seems premature to cut interest rates amid political and fiscal policy uncertainty.

Our overall sense is that the IDR would rally under a scenario of a first round Presidential election victory under Prabowo, due to a reduction in political uncertainty. However, gains would be limited as investors would wait to see the formation of the cabinet in October. There will also be a focus on whether fiscal policy discipline is maintained in any of the future government scenarios. For this reason, we continue to prefer front-end bonds (FX unhedged) as we believe Bank Indonesia will initiate an easing cycle in June – for more see EM Alpha: Indonesia / Philippines – Long IDR vs PHP 19 January 2024.

Macro outlook – election implications

We summarize observers' views on how policies might shape-up post-elections for each of the three Presidential candidates. For a more in-depth analysis please see: Indonesia Watch: Elections: Prabowo's macro policy agenda 29 December 2023.

Prabowo: Broad policy continuity with a protectionist tilt

Prabowo has pledged to continue key policies from Jokowi's era, such as down-streaming, creation of new capital city Nusantara, conditional cash transfers and targeted subsidies. If he wins, he is likely to overlay these with ramp-up in social assistance programs, as well as more protectionist policies aimed at driving military modernization and also strengthen food, water & energy security. Increased spending, if not matched by stronger revenues, could imply fiscal deficit more so in the 2.5-3% of GDP range (and closer to the 3% limit), which contrasts with the more fiscally prudent approach under the current administration led by Finance Minister Sri Mulyani.

Anies: Greater push for changes

Policies could see the greatest shake-up if Anies wins, given his opposition to some of Jokowi's current policies. However, his approach could also be more market-oriented and welcomed by the business community. Observers also noted that a greater push for institutional reforms and stronger governance may augment better for Indonesia's longer-term growth potential.

Ganjar: Taking the middle ground

Ganjar is seen leaning towards stability, and thus least likely amongst the three candidates to "rock the boat". Being a member of PDIP - which is under the leadership of former President Megawati Sukarnoputri – policies and priorities are more likely to be aligned to the interest of the party, which traditionally favours social welfare and SOEs.

EV to remain a key focus post-election

Regardless of whom wins elections, the winning candidate is likely to push ahead with current plans to strengthen Indonesia's EV manufacturing capabilities and increase domestic EV adoption – given the clear benefits from greater current account resilience and reduced emissions (see also EV Trip Notes: Unlocking Indonesia's potential).

Investors appear concerned over global nickel supply glut, which may reflect a combination of soft final EV demand and a shift towards non-nickel battery technology, such as Lithium Ferro Phosphate (LFP).

However, policymakers are hopeful that market potential from wider domestic EV adoption (currently low at <2% for four-wheelers) and perhaps any breakthrough in gaining greater access to US markets could crowd in EV investments into Indonesia. Policymakers' efforts are currently channeled to:

- (1) Raising capacity of higher-grade mixed hydroxide precipitate (MHP) – which can be processed into nickel sulfate to make EV batteries. MHP capacity rose from 145K tons in 2022 to 265K tons in 2023. It is projected to double to almost 600K tons in the next 2-3 years, and potentially raising nickel output by another $4bn - $5bn. Conversely, to better optimize finite pool of nickel ore resources, authorities have already stopped issuing new licences for producing lower grade nickel pig iron (NPI), which is mainly used in the production of stainless steel.

- (2) Increasing capability to produce a broad range of different EV battery components (e.g. cathodes, anodes, copper foil). The hope is that Indonesia could eventually attract gigafactories (i.e. facilities that combine every stage of manufacturing, including batteries, components and EV itself).
- (3) Creating more favourable incentives. On BYD's recently announced plans to invest in Indonesia, the breakthrough in negotiations was partly attributed to the earlier relaxation of tax rules on EV imports last December – which provides for (conditional) tax-free imports of completely built-up cars until 2025.

Beyond EV – Petrochemical, fiberglass & coking coal

Other noteworthy sectors which have to potential to draw sizeable investments include:

- (1) Petrochemical. Reports earlier in April 2023 suggested that China-based Tongkun Group and Xinfengming Group are seeking the Chinese authorities' approval to construct a $10bn refinery and petrochemical hub in Kalimantan Province¹. This could also potentially help to reduce Indonesia's reliance on oil imports.
- (2) Fiberglass. Over the past 2 years, there have been exchanges between Indonesia (rich in silica sand, which is a raw material for fiberglass) and China Jushi (one of the world's largest producer) over a potential new factory Indonesia².
- (3) Coking coal (or metallurgical coal), which is used in the production of steel. At the moment, most of Indonesia's coal exports are thermal coal, which is mainly used for the production of electricity.

Policy rate path more tied to IDR outlook

Policymakers have a preference to cut policy rates, perhaps given the need to create more monetary accommodativeness (currently seen as neutral) to support GDP growth, which is still seen slightly below the estimated potential growth rate of 5.3-5.4% in 2024. Two factors are of importance here before policymakers would consider rate cuts, namely (a) inflation outlook, and (b) IDR stability.

On inflation, policymakers appear clearly more comfortable compared to a few months ago. Headline inflation of around 2.5% this year is seen as “manageable” (or the mid-point of BI’s 1.5-3.5% target), more benign compared to current Bloomberg Consensus of 3%. This is attributed to a smaller impact from El Nino this year, likely cap on increases of administered prices in an election year, price competition from e-commerce, structural reforms over the past years, as well as sharpened focus on inflation at provincial levels (e.g. local leaders’ performances are linked to inflation outcomes).

This leaves the current IDR volatility – which has not been helped by uncertainties over elections and the Fed outlook – as the key constrain presently. As such, policymakers seem to have struck to a somewhat cautious tone for now with its forecast for the Fed to cut 2-3 times in 2H’24 less conservative vs. ours and markets.
