

US Rates Alpha

Long 5y outright or through proxies

Rates almost 50bp lower from the peak

10y yields are almost 50bp lower from the recent peak in late October. In the 4.75-5% range there was not enough conviction to go short (see Exhibit 1), but few dared to go long given the momentum of the summer selloff. Recent events seem to have tipped the market from the standoff, with yields breaking on the downside under broadly lower vol.

What changed?

Since late September it has been progressively more difficult for data to beat expectations, which is clearly reflected in the recent top for the Bloomberg economic surprise index (see Exhibit 2). News flow over the last week presents greater conviction to buy with clearer signs that the Fed is restrictive and a more supportive supply backdrop. This is evidenced through: (1) softening in payrolls following a soft ISM and durables (2) earnings guidance cooling (3) a dovish leaning Fed even after very strong economic performance in Q3 and (4) UST adjusting supply to balance demand (see November refunding: rate sensitive).

Positioning realignment likely adding to the move

Positioning is likely exacerbating the move with speculators and momentum investors seen covering shorts, and asset managers adding (see Historic back-end UST fund inflows but curve remains biased to steepen).

Recommendations

Our duration stance has been broadly neutral with a bias towards nibbling at 10yT levels c.5% (see most recently in Nibble at c.5%). We move our view to a cautious duration long here, and favor the belly of the curve to express this view through:

- Outright 5y long, targeting 3.75% on the position with a stop at 4.90%
- 5s30s steepeners with a target of 40bp on the position and a stop at 10bp
- Long 3y1y receiver spreads ATM/ATM-50bp, with a cost of 23bp of delta (indicative) and 27bp max upside. The downside is capped to the upfront premium.

Why the belly

The baseline scenario reflected in these recommendations is one where data recouples to soft landing over the next quarter. In these scenarios we expect the near-term curve bias to be for outperformance of the belly vs. the wings, driven by: (1) belly forwards correct towards neutral rate expectations as the market shifts the baseline view from no-landing to soft-landing; (2) the potential for neutral rate expectations to reprice lower from c.3.75% levels we have seen in the recent upgrade to levels c.3-3.25% that we believe are more aligned with our economists view and the Fed's own estimates for the neutral. Closer to the first rate cut (still expected only in 2H24) the bias generally shifts towards 2s10s bull steepeners, but for now the belly is likely to lead on rallies.
