Long Jan24 Bubill spreads vs Dec23

Key takeaways

- Various market pricing indicates rather benign expectations over the upcoming year-end turn
- We believe that this shows that the market may not have started to prepare for the turn or is too complacent over it
- We recommend being long Jan24 Bubill spreads vs Dec23

Markets appear to remain complacent...

We made the case that the market is complacent on euro area liquidity and recommended Mar24 Euribor futures vs €str wideners (current: 12bp, target: 25bp, stop: 8bp); see our 19 May 2023 report. While, as we had expected, the TLTRO rolloff in June 2023 did not lead to a sudden tightening in bank funding conditions, it is interesting that the term premium in the unsecured wholesale market declined slightly following the TLTRO rolloff (Exhibit 1). We believe that this is a sign of complacency still in the market. We continue to believe that as excess liquidity declines on QT and TLTRO rollofs, bank demand for term funding should rise. While some banks recently turned to the ECB's refi operations for funding, these banks are unlikely to fully replace TLTRO funding with refi operations from a cost and net stable funding requirement perspective (Exhibit 2).

... in more than one way...

We argue it is not only in the Euribor-€str market where complacency is evident. The EUR FX-Sofr basis tightened in June as the TGA rebuild has had limited impact on USD funding costs. But BofA Global Research US strategists (see the 21 June 2023 US Rates Watch) continue to expect further net bill issuance over the next one to two months to widen T-bills vs OIS. Indeed, the market is pricing in a gradual widening in the EUR FX-Sofr basis in one to two months (Exhibit 3), which would be consistent with our US strategists' view. But, beyond that, we argue that the recent tightening in EUR FX-Sofr basis over the year-end turn is hard to explain and may even be challenged (Exhibit 4).

... we recommend long Jan24 Bubill spreads vs Dec23

In recent years, the market has started to prepare for the year-end turn as early as the summer. Core/semi-core euro bills indicate limited pressure so far to prepare for this year's turn (Exhibit 5). This could reflect limited short positioning and increased bond supply in the market (Exhibit 6). However, we believe that the risks are skewed towards year-end pressures increasing, with demand for bills that cover the year-end turn increasing for netting purposes, especially if short bond positions are rebuilt. We recommend long Jan24 Bubill vs €str and short Dec23 Bubill vs €str (current: -3bp, target: -15bp, stop: +5bp). The choice to short Dec23 reflects that bill does not cover the year-end turn and so cannot be used for netting purposes over the turn. The risk to trade is that with year-end pressures being particularly limited, short bond positioning remains very low.
