Restrictions on DMA impact quant funds

Industry Overview

Quant to quit, but regulators need to manage the pace

A-share turnover reached RMB1.3tn yesterday, the highest in the past 10 months. It was a surprise when market sentiment remained relatively low and retail inflow stayed weak, based on the rebounds of margin financing data in the past few days. The key market concern on the turnover surge when no major fundamental changes took place intraday is that regulators may ask quant funds to phase out, which would lead to selloff of small- and micro-cap stocks (CSI1000 and CSI2000 stocks, Chart 1) held by quant funds. The shrinking size of quant funds would be the results of both funds' own choice when their strategies no longer work when regulations tightening continues, and regulators' requirement. The total size quant funds would need to sell is estimated to be RMB200-400bn. If the selling pressure on small- and micro-stocks rises rapidly, the A-share market, which rebounded in the past week, could see rising volatility, and the National team would need to inject more to stabilize both large-cap and small-cap ETFs.

Restrictions on DMA limits quant funds leverage

Quant funds in China, from 2023, outperformed market with their "Long small-/micro-cap stocks and short index futures" strategies and the extensive use of leverage from DMA (Direct Market Access) provided by brokers. With up to 4x leverage, quant funds received excessive return in the tough market in 2023. DMA was regulated by end 2023 and we do not think regulators will loosen control in the near-term. In fact, we think DMA could further diminish, i.e., brokers could require quant funds to make early repayment and quant funds would have to sell their position for potential redemption.

National team could re-enter the market

The National team, i.e. China's stabilization funds, after injecting USD47bn into the market this year, kept quiet after Chinese New Year holiday. We did not detect its move in the past 4 trading days (Chart 2). However, we witnessed the rise of ETF volume yesterday and it could show that the National Team re-entered the market and wanted to stabilize again. ETFs and northbound are still the major ways we follow the National Team's move.

Impact on brokers

Brokers have previously suffered from Snowball hedging losses in Jan, but this time around, crackdown on DMA and quants may not incur as much investment losses for brokers as they earn stable yield for providing leveraged funds, despite performances of the quants. However, as new DMA leverage is restricted to 2x, shrinking size and profitability for broker's trading business could be anticipated, especially for those that rely more on equity trading and derivatives such as CICC. At end Sept 2023, Trading income accounted for 40% or higher mix in adjusted operating income for CICC, Huatai, and CMS. We expect Galaxy, CITICS, and GFS to be better off as DMA diminishes, due to lower revenue contribution from equity trading/DMA.
