Australia Economic Watch

RBA review: Cool your jets

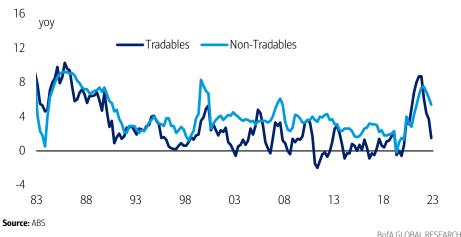

Rates have peaked, but easing is not imminent

The RBA has kept the cash rate unchanged at 4.35%, as we and consensus expected. Despite the downside surprise to CPI that prompted some downgrades to the RBA's CPI forecasts, the Bank kept a hawkish stance suggesting "further increase in interest rates cannot be ruled out". The decision to hold the cash rate steady supports "progress of inflation towards the 2.5% target within a reasonable timeframe". Based on the new forecasts, the RBA is expected to meet the mid-point of the target range in 1H 2026. As we had anticipated (see Asia Economic Weekly: Australia – RBA set to hold, dovish pivot seems unlikely 02 February 2024), focus remains on sticky domestic inflation while much of the easing in inflation pressures has been due to tradables and goods.

Nonetheless, the RBA's hawkish bias could prove difficult to sustain going forward given the economy is slowing, and tighter monetary policy has contributed to slower demand. The labour market is less tight, with employment growth and hours worked having declined of late. Constraints in the household sector along with global uncertainty remain key risks into 2024 and could see earlier easing than we currently expect. We think inflation is likely to reach target earlier than the RBA expects (see: Australia Economic Watch: CPI review: Faster progress towards target 31 January 2024).

Exhibit 1: Non-tradables in focus

Easing of inflation driven by global factors

Data dependence and conservative forecasts

The path of interest rates will depend upon the data and "the evolving assessment of risks". While risks are evenly balanced, the Bank would prefer to err on the hawkish side until there is more confidence on the path of domestic inflation. The Bank's conservative inflation forecasts and uncertainty around the economic outlook, along with leading indicators for the labour market suggesting softer conditions ahead may see a shift in focus from inflation to job gains over 2024.
