Bank of England Review: cuts not close

On hold

The Bank of England (BoE) kept Bank Rate on hold in a 6-3 vote, as expected. The dissenting voters preferred a 25bp hike, while the Committee kept the bias towards hiking further. The minutes of today's BoE meeting suggest the central bank sees a more persistent inflation problem in the UK than the Euro-area or US. Accordingly, the BoE seem to want very strong evidence of a sustained changed in inflation dynamics, which will, we think, take time. We see cuts in the first half of next year as unlikely. We expect the first cut in February 2025 with risks skewed towards a 2H 2024 easing.

As interpret data with caution

Markets have reacted strongly to recent UK data releases, fully pricing in a rate cut as early as next May with a 35% probability of a cut in March, just two monetary policy meetings away. The BoE's minutes today suggest the central bank is considerably more cautious. The majority said "...economic developments had been relatively limited overall. For most members within this group, it was too early to conclude that services price inflation and pay growth were on a firmly downward path." Weaker pay growth in recent months had to set in the broader context of much higher wage and services inflation in the UK than elsewhere. A reference to next year's minimum wage increase posing an upside inflation risk suggests rate setters want to wait for wage data past April before considering cuts. Overall, the minutes suggest to us that rate setters are looking for very strong evidence before changing their bias from further hikes.

Misgivings over market pricing

The minutes have several references to market pricing that suggest the BoE thinks markets have gone too far. The pushback is mild and often implicit but in our view the BoE is trying to distance itself from the Fed. Rate setters say "As illustrated by the November Monetary Policy Report projections, the Committee continues to judge that monetary policy is likely to need to be restrictive for an extended period of time." The November Report had no change in rates through 3Q 2024. Meanwhile the following sentence suggests to us the Committee is concerned markets have brought forward rate cuts too far "The Committee would continue to monitor closely the impact on activity and inflation of the significant increase in Bank Rate. It would also consider the impact of recent financial market movements on its macroeconomic projections as part of the forecast round ahead of its next meeting.". A commitment problem lies at the heart of this. The BoE would prefer a 'table mountain' path for rates, holding at current levels for an extended period, which elevates 2y and 5y yields and squeezes growth. But rate setters can't or won't commit to that. When markets price in earlier cuts as a result, financial conditions may ease too much, requiring more rate hikes or holding spot rates higher for even longer. We see the reference to next year's minimum wage increase and downplaying news in wage growth and services inflation as the BoE attempted to reinforce is 'table mountain' preference: the bar for data to shift the position is very high. ## Blink and the rates market impact is gone

UK rates pared post-Fed gains only very briefly after the December MPC, with front-end back to pricing almost exact same Bank rate cutting profile less than an hour after the meeting. Limited market reaction stood in contrast to our read of the minutes as a clear implicit and somewhat explicit pushback against market pricing, made more meaningful after yesterday's Fed meeting. Governor Bailey's attempt to distance the UK from the US in post-BoE press comments did not make material difference to market pricing either. Our idea to fade bank rate cuts priced in 2024 versus positioning for more ECB rate cuts in 2025 suffered as markets have reacted strongly to recent UK data releases. But market pricing of BoE rate cuts remains well in excess of our base case scenario of first cut in February 2025, with risks skewed towards a 2H 2024 easing, and we see cuts in the first half of next year as unlikely. We hold onto the view.

Front-end aside, there was nothing new on the Quantitative Tightening (QT) changes front ahead of tomorrow's quarterly operational arrangements announcement for 1Q24. The standard statement stated that "the MPC had been briefed on progress on these Gilt sales and on the operational arrangements for 2024 Q1, which would be published in a Market Notice at 4.30pm on 15 December". This did not come as a surprise given comments from the Deputy Governor suggesting that nothing is likely to be imminent. Perhaps reading too much into it, but the standard statement could be interpreted as saying that the operational arrangements (for example, the "bucket" splits) have nothing to do with the MPC, with the MPC just getting briefed on them. We await for tomorrow's market notice to confirm details of 1Q24 active Gilt sales plan.

FX: Pushing back

A key pillar of our views on G10 FX has been the argument that rates markets were premature too price in rate cuts in 2024, nowhere more so than in the UK. The Bank of England used the final meeting of 2023 to reiterate that restrictive policy is needed for an extended period of time. Markets had probably focused too much on the dovish FOMC as a precursor for dovish tilts elsewhere. However, we have been clear that the unique set of challenges that the BoE faces stands it apart from many of its peers. The BoE clearly believe that more progress is needed to bring down inflation despite some positive signs earlier this week that wage growth has been slowing. With the November inflation report due next week, we believe that GBP is becoming increasingly data dependent. Weaker growth and earnings growth pressured GBP earlier in the week and whilst the direction of travel in inflation has been encouraging, the overall pace of price growth is still too uncomfortable for policy makers. Nonetheless, despite the BoE insistence that conditions do not warrant imminent rate cut, the BoE is also likely to be in conflict with softer data in the coming months. Keeping rates higher for longer due to structural macro-headwinds. For this reason, we are reluctant to chase this move higher in GBP as we believe that macro headwinds will likely intensify next year. For now, the BoE is providing some GBP support but this is not a sustainable equilibrium.
