CPI preview: Trust traction, ignore oil

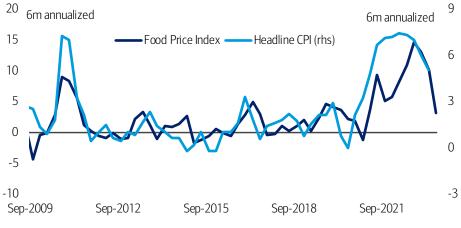

CPI will be strong in 3Q, but it is slowing

Inflation data for the September quarter will be released next Tuesday and we see a strong 2%qoq rise that takes annual inflation slightly down to 5.9%yoy from 6%yoy on the back of base effects. The rise in 3Q is primarily driven by higher fuel prices along with seasonal increases in alcohol taxes and council rates. Our estimation is just below the Reserve Bank of New Zealand's 2.1%qoq assumption.

While inflation remains well above target, the pulse is slowing (Exhibit 1). Encouragingly, food prices eased by 0.4% in September, but remain 8% higher in the year. This is the lowest annual rate in 14 months.

No need for the RBNZ to tighten further

Traction from high rates is constraining demand, but the economy has been more resilient than expected. The latter, along with near-term upside risk to CPI adds to the case for a hawkish tone a potentially further tightening. This is not our base case. While core inflation is still high and sticky, 3Q outcomes will likely be looked through by the RBNZ given transitory factors driving the rise. Indeed, the Bank is projecting a return to the top of the 1-3% target band in the second half of 2024 and the 2% target midpoint in 2025.

The RBNZ's November meeting is the last of 2023 and will provide a full forecast update that will reflect stronger than expected economic growth. Recent communication from the Bank suggest the Board will continue to assess the impact of rapid tightening in the economy and the labour market. In its annual report, the RBNZ has reviewed the inflation target. The review found that the current approach of flexible inflation targeting with a medium-term focus remains the most appropriate framework for NZ. This suggests some deviations from target should not trigger an immediate policy response.

Some signs of cooling, but core is sticky

We expect 3Q CPI for New Zealand to print 2.1%qoq to keep the annual growth rate unchanged at 6.0%. Fuel prices are expected to have led the increase as temporary reductions in the fuel excise tax ended on 30 June 2023, the impact of which will be captured in the September inflation print. Additionally, the recent escalation in geopolitical tensions in the Middle East poses further upside risk to oil a broader energy price.

With economic growth having surprised on the upside in 2Q See: New Zealand Economic Watch: GDP review: Too good to be true 21 September 2023 and strong population growth we would expect core inflation to remain sticky for longer, particularly for the housing component. However, the rise in international migration also contributes to easing labour supply constraints that could see softer wages ahead. Indeed, wages have increased sharply for the farm sector (Exhibit 2). Recent data suggests wages have peaked albeit at a higher level than overall input prices.

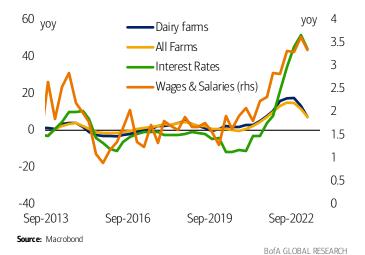

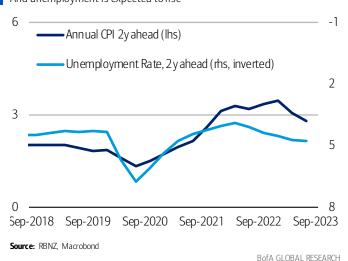

Exhibit 3: Business inflation expectations ease And unemployment is expected to rise

With interest rates having peaked (See: New Zealand Economic Watch: RBNZ review: Not so hawkish 04 October 2023) business confidence has improved, and inflation expectations are starting to ease (Exhibit 3). Meanwhile, house prices have stabilised. These are positive developments for the RBNZ. Focus will now shift to the labour market. We expect unemployment rate to tick up to 3.8% in 3Q on the back of increased participation which is already at a multi-decade high.

Overall, the RBNZ expects inflation to return to its 2% target midpoint towards the end of 2025. Given the expected slowing in domestic demand, a softening in the labour market is likely. Employment is also expected to fall below its maximum sustainable level for a time, in the RBNZ's view.

However, net immigration increases both the supply of labour and demand in the economy. RBNZ's research suggests the demand impact is greater than the supply impact, particularly in the short term. The RBNZ seems to have tolerance for transitory increases in inflation, but sticky core inflation that could delay the return to target means rates will stay elevated for longer than anticipated, in our view.
